MEMORIAL SERMON

Preached Last Evening at the Fourth Street M. E. Church.

IMMENSE CONGREGATION PRESENT

Including G. A. H. Posts, Sons of Veterans and Women's Relief Corps. The Sermon Was an Elequent, Interesting and Patriotic One-A Resume of the Causes Leading to the Greatest Conflict of the Century.

Last evening at the Fourth street M. E church, the pastor, Rev. Dr. A. B. Riker, preached to an immense congregation, including Holliday and Stephens posts, G. A. R., U. S. Grant camp, Sons of Veterans, and the Womans' Relief corps. The sermon was a memorial one, commemorative of the half million Union soldiers, who died from wounds and disease that this nation might be one and undivided, and was delivered at the invitation of the local G. A. R. posts. The congregation was so large that chairs had to be placed along nisice.

Before commencing the sermon Dr. Riker requeated the congregation to join in the chorus of Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Kepublic," which he said was appropriate to the occasion in itself, and was written by a woman who was born and lived among scenes of the late war. Mrs. Frank Stanton sang the hymn, and the large congregation took up the chorus, the volume of the later filling the church to its utthe latter filling the church to its ut-

Dr. Riker said that he had accepted the invitation to deliver the memorial sermon with feelings of reluctancy and madequacy. He felt that no man could portray the grandeur of what the old veterans represent. He believed that God had

"We are commemorating the memory of the 500,000 Union soldlers who died in the late war from the results of wounds on the field of battle, or from exposure after the struggle; of these $25,391 rest in the national cemeteries, while 148,804 lie in unknown graves. We are here to remember these heroes, and think of their glorious deeds. We must not, however, forget those who survived. It is but an accident that those who survived and are present tonight did not meet the same fate. They took the same risks, but these withstood the battle; the others fell. They who are here this evening remember the war from different standpoints; the old soldier went through the scenes of carnage, but We are commemorating the memory by reason of youthfulness remained behind, but their hearts beat in sympathy with those at the front.

"These old soldiers think to-night of the awful scenes of carnage; think of the struggle, the dead lying around thom, the streams of flowing blood and of the night after the battle when the dead comrades were gathered and buried in the trenches; afterwards of the hospital, with the surgeons with buckots of water reddened with blood; of women on their errands of mercy, bearing messages for loved ones at the distant home. Some, perhaps, are thinking of experiences in the southern prisons, Libby, Andersonville and others where scenes were enacted that we can scarcely think true, but were fearful in their reality. Others who remained at the rear remember of reading the news of the battles in the ing the news of the battles in the newspapers, and of the wall that arose anon for a father or a brother at the

"The question arises whether the loss of half a million of lives and mil-lions of treasure sunk, has found a re-sult worthy of Almighty God. These men died worthfly and we do well to

PERPETUATE THEIR MEMORY.
"The position of the south in the late contest was illogical in two parts. First the doctrine of state rights, the idea of which was but a loose compact of states, the bond of which could at any time be severed; this was not God's doctrine, for nothing is clearer than that God had a hand in the formation of this gov-

had a hand in the formation of this government. It was illogical for any part of the Union to break it up; not part wrong, half wrong, but all wrong.

"The other part of the position of the South that was illogical was its advocacy and upholding of human slavery; giving one man the right to own the body of another. God said that all men had the right to govern themselves, and Jesus Christ put in practice the principle that slavery is impossible. The time came for those principles to the principle that stavery is impossible. The time came for these principles to be asserted, and thank God he found heroesto battles for his doctrines. These two doctrines came to be intertwined and two doctrines came to be intertwined and state rights and slavery and the North took a direct opposite view. At first the issues were not sectional, but they finally became so. The Missouri compromise, the omnibus bill, the Kansas-Nebraska bill, all hold back the conflict for periods, but it could not be quelled, and the South seceded. and the South seceded.

invited them back into the union, with their muskets, cannon and the awful carnage of five years, and after these carnage of five years, and after these five years they accepted and came back over the graves of their heretical doctrines, that were buried so deep they will never have a resurrection.

"How would the condition of affairs have been if the South had been victorious? We would have had a country three thousand miles long, and at one point less than a hundred miles wide. It would have been necessary to keep under arms vast companies of men, as is the case in Europe to-day. A Southern soldier once told me that he thanked God that the South had not been nuccessful. During four years' residence in the South I failed to find one man who did not thank God that the South had failed. Such a system as would have evolved would not long have been tolerated.

"This war settled many things; it settled that this country would not be lially freez and Half slave.

HALF PREE AND HALF BLAVE.

It settled that our people must be one and undivided. I am grateful, as a son of a veteran, that this nation is one, and of a veteran, that this nation is one, and that to the world looking on there is not the shadow of a slave.

"There was never a braver army than that of the south, and no injustice is sione to the northern soldier when that is said. There was never such a war in the past, and such wonderful resources, bravery and ingenuity of military tactics as were shown by the soldier of the north and the south, were never before shown to the world. The war exercised a special influence on the world. No power or congregation of foreign powers would to-day dare to do battle against Consolidated America. I am sure if there was a war now the south would be at the front; we are a united nation. "The war was a religious war, the North prayed and the South prayed. The songs of the war almost invariably have the thought of our holy religion in them.

"I hope that all the living survivors of the terrible struggle will live to a tender old age, well cared for. You are in a sense the saviors of mankind, and have saved to unborn generation principles that will make your names famous in history.

MISS VANDELIA VARUM

Talks Temperance to o Good Audience at the Grand.

Miss Vandelia Varnum, the noted temperance agitator, addressed a good sized audience at the Grand Opera House yesterday afternoon at 3:30, and last evening she spoke in the Third Preebyterian church, where the mem-hers of the Woman's Christian Temper-ance Union were present in large num-lers.

bors of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were present in large numbers.

Miss Varnum is from New York. She is of medium height, plump, and has a look of earnestness which well fits her character. She is a forcible and sincers speaker, civing, evidently, more attention to what she shall say than to how she shall say it. She dresses neatly and modestly in black.

Mrs. I. P. Sieson presided over the afternoon meeting, and Dr. Harriet Jones led the singing. There were a number of other ladies on the platform with the speaker.

"The saloon must go" was the burden and refrain of her discourse. She said she did not want anybody to think she would bring the saloon into politics. She never talked politics when speaking on temperance. If she wished to, she could not connect the saloon and politics; that had been done long ago. Today the politician and the office seeker will kneel and lick the dust off the rum seller's shoes, and turn his back on the Christian. He counts the church member, the Christian voter, as one, and the saloon keeper as twenty. People do not feel an evil until it comes home in some way. This great evil of the ago has come home to so many that all over the land a cry goes up and will not be silenced. "The saloon must go!"

By the saloon, Miss Narnum said, she meant every place where liquor is sold; the licensed place and the unicensed; the grocery that sells drinks, and that place with a front door where you go in and see books, and combs and brushes, and all that sort of things, and a back door where a man may go in and lay down his ten cents and drink what he pleases, while, perhaps, his best girl is in the front buying a plotograph album and knows nothing of his what he pleases, while, perhaps, his best girl is in the front buying a photo-graph album, and knows nothing of his She said foreigners come here, with-

She said foreigners come here, without capital, trade or character, and they find in the saloon business an opening to make a living which requires no capital, for the brewers or distillers are glad to carry them, and they do not need even to know the language of the land, for many of their customers can speak the foreign tongue.

The saloon must go, she said, or the American home must go; American self-respect must go; the dignity of the American government and all that is good and holy must go. The cry could not be stilled, the issue would not die, but with increasing volume and increasing strength the forces of the right would go on until the evil was swept from the face of the earth.
